I really enjoyed creating my e-folio. It took quite some time, but in the end, what I created, I think, reflects very well on who I see myself as. When I first created my weebly account, I was very unsure of how to navigate it. After speaking with Sam Bert about this, and playing around with the different conventions, I finally got the hang of how to manipulate everything to create my final product. It was fairly easy to create each one of the tabs I made, then insert the format and add content. This took some playing around with and getting used to, because I had to learn how to place it to make it look appropriate. There were a wide array of options that I was able to choose from, and the “help” button came in handy to help with any little detail issues I had. I think this is a very accessible medium to use for creating e-folios, I really enjoyed the process.

When I first created my e-folio, I had simply tried to play around with the layout and create the shell of it. Once I got into adding content to it, I realized how everything that we have been learning this semester was coming to a head. Even creating this e-folio contributed to us as digital citizens, using creativity, and moving from print to visual literacies. We had to be fluent in everything we had learned in order to create these e-folios. When I first started this, the elements were there without me even thinking about it. But going back and reworking things with what we have learned in mind, made it all more clear to me how important 21st century literacies and new media literacies will be for us when we begin teaching.
